During this pandemic, many universities rely on web conferencing platforms to conduct online or hybrid (a mix of online and in-person) classes. Some students worry about the use of such technology infringing on their privacy rights.

Should universities and professors have the right to require that the students keep their video feeds on during online classes to ensure participation/attendance? Explain why or why not?

Should professors have the right to require that the students show them 360° views of their private rooms/surroundings before taking an online quiz or exam to prevent cheating? Explain why or why not?

Many web conferencing platforms offer the option of having the online classes recorded and made available on the Internet to be viewed later. Due to learning disabilities, some students may need recordings of all classes they take. Other students may object to being recorded while participating in class and having the recordings made public. Do these latter students have the right to object? Explain why or why not?
